

Mi'kmaq: First Nation people

A community reawakening

Narrator:

The island of Newfoundland, in the far East of Canada. An isolated bay, situated along its Western coast has been home to a small Conne River community of indigenous Mi'qmaq people for generations.

The bay was officially designated as an Indian reserve in 1987. With the help of federal funding, it's changed form being poor and isolated, into a strong, rural community with full employment, and has attracted people into the area.

There's also been a reawakening of the communities First Nation identity and their traditional animistic culture.
