Well look I think that um, prior to Dave and I's engagement to the project the general state of relationships between teenagers and the elderly were not particularly good. In the sense that there were huge misconceptions about each group. Because why would they socially, why would they interact. Other than inside, inside the family. So it as a great opportunity for us to kind of dispel those myths. Dispel those misconceptions and actually go you know what, you have such a massive amount to offer one another. Hard to statisize if you like, very hard. But the value is there all the same because it's emotional and it's um, it's an emotional literacy that is inter-generational because everybody was a teenager and the teenagers, the only the best thing that they can hope for is that they are gonna get old. So why wouldn't you just bridge that gap a little bit and go, right OK, and we learn from each other on a level playing field, with mutual respect with care and with love. They are the foundation stones surely, and the glue of any community and the general, general society really. That's my view.
