

Si King:

Well my personal perceptions obviously are incredibly positive ones because my, most of my um, most of my role models were women and most of them were senior women. Um, my Mum was 46 when she had be so that was quite old back in 1966. Good year that won the world cup you know. Not likely to see that again in a hurry. But um, so, so for me, my perceptions of the old were because I was kind of brought up with them you know, as part of a community, as part of my extended family and as part of my immediate family so. So um my perceptions were as wonderful as, as, as the older generations are really. They're incredibly informed. They've lived an amazing life. They've live uh, it's rather, when I'm asked questions like this, if you forgive me, I always refer to the native American cultures whereby that the elders of that culture are held in enormously high esteem as do, as the Hindu cultures and the Buddhist cultures as well. There is a reason for that. Because they have lived a life and that life is of value to their families, to their communities, to the people that they interact with. So it seemed a kind of natural fit if you like that if you put two incredibly diverse and relatively isolated members of society together and go right [CLAPS HANDS] let's see what happens.
