

Environmental Science in the Field

Environmental Science in the Field

The environment in which living things develop interact and survive are influenced by a wide range of living and non-living factors. This album follows Open University students as they study habitats, measure evapotranspiration, water flow and quality and examine soil and grass taking detailed field notes and analysing their observations.

This material forms part of The Open University course SXR216 Environmental Science in the Field.