

LYNNE JOHNSON: Employers have long identified teamwork as one of the key competencies that they value in employees. And team building exercises are nothing new. So why are employers still citing this as one of the skills most job applicants lack? Being able to understand and articulate your experience of working in teams is crucial in terms of job seeking and progression. We all know this, yet many of us are guilty of being able to say little more than, I work well as part of a team, or, I'm equally motivated working alone when applying for jobs. Does this sound like you?

This course will help you consider your experience of working in teams and the different roles you play in them. It will increase your confidence in marketing this key skill to employers, as well as improve your ability to perform well in your current teams. You'll also consider why team diversity has increased, and explore both the benefits and difficulties of working in teams of an increasingly diverse character as well as teams that are spread across different geographical locations. So if you are part of a team or are interested in team dynamics, this course is for you.
