

Living in a globalised world

Protecting the old dream

Glenn Spencer

Get girl, this way. This way. Turn.

Narrato:

But there are concerned citizens in the United States, who want to keep their old dreams. They are fearful of what they call the Mexicanisation of America. The growing strength of Latino culture throughout the country. And that the border will disappear.

Glenn Spencer, American Border Patro:

President Reagan once said 'A nation without a border is not a nation'. If you have people just flooding in, willy nilly, millions and millions and millions of them. Eventually they're going to say 'Taxation without representation'. We want to vote. So that means anybody can come into the United States and vote. Well let's all flood in there, and we'll vote the Americans out and we'll take over. Well that's a good idea.

Glenn Spencer, President American Border Patro:

We're tracking Mexico as regaining lost territory by migratory means. They are taking back lost territory and Mexican's believe that. But our government refuses to address any of these problems. They I think are sacrificing the United States on the alter of globalism. And Mexico is saying 'well while you're at it, I think we'll just take this part. While you're at this silliness of globalism'. Mexico which is a very nationalistic country is taking back what it believes was stolen from them.
